The knight saw, moreover, as his conductors dragged him away, a house containing numerous large cauldrons, which were full of liquid pitch, sulphur, and melted metals, wherein were human beings of both sexes, and of all ranks and ages; some wholly immersed, some up to their eyes, others to their lips and necks, others to their breasts, and others again only to their knees and legs.

Broken (P.S.)

Most deal implicitly with Christian themes such as sin, humanity's fall from grace and redemption. I turn in particular to the generative possibilities offered by speculative fiction for envisioning more hopeful Black educational futurities while simultaneously making visible the unevenly distributed unlivability of the Anthropocene.
